COMMUNITY REPRESENTATIVE IN THE RESTORATIVE JUSTICE PROCESS

Restorative Justice provides an opportunity for those impacted by crime -offenders, victims, and the wider community- to discuss how crime has affected their lives and what steps need to be taken to repair the harm caused and to "make things right." Neighbor-to-Neighbor Mediation has provided victim-offender mediation services to the Linn and Benton Juvenile Departments for many years, and is expanding these services to include restorative justice dialogues in incidents where the community has been directly impacted by crime and/or the crime victim declines to participate in the dialogue. In order for this process to succeed, we need volunteers from the community who are willing to participate in the restorative justice process and share their stories of how crime has impacted them personally and as a member of their community. In addition to sharing your story, you would have the opportunity to work with youth offenders on how they can take accountability for their actions and repair the harm caused by those actions. This short training will prepare you to engage meaningfully in the role of community representative in the restorative justice process.
